Officials at Framingham State College isolated a student after learning on Saturday that the individual was seen at MetroWest Medical Center and may have contracted H1N1 swine flu.

"The hospital did not test for H1N1, so this diagnosis is probable, not confirmed," said an e-mail notification sent over the weekend to students and college staff.

The student who lives out of state, was moved to a previously prepared isolated living space on campus and will remain there until fever-free for 24 hours, the e-mail said.

No further cases of flu-like illness have been detected on campus.

The e-mail asked that anyone with flu-like symptoms report them to the school's Health Services and remain at home.
