

licenses, another showed a fake university identification card and the fourth showed a Vermont driver's license, the report said. All four told the investigator they were asked to show their identification upon entering the bar.

After an April hearing, the commission found the bar had violated the state's law banning the sale of alcohol to persons under 21 and suspended its alcohol license for 14 days; however, 11 of those days are being held in abeyance for two years as long as the bar remains violation-free during that period.

Seven suspension days held in a two-year abeyance from violations in 2009 are being served now, along with the three suspension days from the February incident, to make up the total 10-day suspension.

Signs posted on the front of the building say the bar will reopen on Mon., Sept. 20 at 5 p.m.
