A 9-month-old boy was left inside a car parked at a Whole Foods store Sunday afternoon, when temperatures were in the high 80s, according to Boston Police. Two security guards saw the child in a car at the store in the Charles River Plaza and called police, who arrived just before 1 p.m. The boy was alert, but he was taken to Massachusetts General Hospital to be evaluated, police said. The boy's mother said she had forgotten about the boy and had left him in the car for about 30 minutes. A police spokeswoman said that while the incident appeared to be an accident, a child abuse and neglect report will be filed with the Massachusetts Department of Children and Families.

Vt. high court says inmate convicted before '04 law entitled to public lawyer

The Vermont Supreme Court ruled Friday that a former Castleton man convicted of killing a school janitor in 1992 is entitled to a public defender to continue his appeals even though attorneys who have looked at his case believe his legal claims have no merit. The decision came on the 20th anniversary of the killing of a Castleton school janitor by Charles Crannell, now 70 and serving a life sentence at a Kentucky prison.
