Boston. He said the best part about living here was the city's women, the worst part was the snow.

This summer, 34-year-old Park Jae-sang, known to most as PSY, released the single "Gangnam Style." The catchy song and its accompanying music video and dances have gained rapid global popularity with more than half a billion views on YouTube.

On Wednesday, he answered questions from users on the social website reddit.com, including one fan who wrote that they were curious about whether PSY's days as a student at Berklee College of Music prepared him for his career.

PSY, via the username PSY_Oppa, replied that "1. Unfortunately I didn't attend class that much. Sorry! 2. When I was in college I was young and stupid so I thought I cannot learn creative things from other people like professors. I taught myself. But nowadays sometimes I regret but things worked out ok."

In the late 1990s, PSY enrolled in classes at Berklee, and before that at Boston University. Another fan asked him Wednesday: "What were the best and worst things about living in Boston as a student?"

The musician wrote back: "Best thing is so many beautiful college girls, worst is

And, asked if he's bothered that everyone only wants to talk about that one song, he replied: "It's ok because most people only know the one song. I can fix that later."

When he signed out of the online question-and-answer session, he said he was going to the studio to finish his new record.
