The average “net price” of college — what families pay per academic year after factoring in financial aid and grants — has risen across the board in recent years. And ironically, the sharpest increase has been for students who can least afford it.

Data from the US Department of Education shows that students tend to pay a lower net price the less money their families have.

But the most recent five years of available data, ending with the 2013-14 school year, show that the poorest students — those whose families made $30,000 a year or less — have seen the largest percentage increase in net price.

The trend has been highlighted before, including in a report in 2014 by the The Dallas Morning News, The Hechinger Report and the Education Writers Association.

That report said that financial aid experts and some college administrators have worried the trend “will further widen the gap between the nation’s rich and poor” by putting college degrees “beyond the economic reach of growing numbers of students.”

Average 'net price' at US colleges has risen fastest for low-income students

Private 4-year colleges:

Income level	2009-10	2013-14	5-year change
$30,000 or less	$15,532	$17,214	11%

$75,001 to $110,000	$22,216	$23,703	7%
$110,001 or more	$25,439	$27,462	8%

Public 4-year colleges:

Income level	2009-10	2013-14	5-year change
$30,000 or less	$7,895	$9,592	22%
$30,001 to $48,000	$9,362	$10,806	15%
$48,001 to $75,000	$12,498	$13,805	10%
$75,001 to $110,000	$14,779	$16,535	12%
$110,001 or more	$15,377	$17,497	14%

Public 2-year colleges:

Income level	2009-10	2013-14	5-year change
