GLOBE STAFF SEPTEMBER 08, 2016

The storm named Hermine won't stop toying with us.

Thursday marked the fourth straight day that the former hurricane has lingered, spinning in circles off the coast of our drought-stricken region, delivering mostly a steady stream of promising-looking clouds but little rain.

Forecasters expect the pesky storm's weak remnants will continue to mock us for yet another day before it flees to sea Friday.

Most places in the area have gotten just one-quarter to a half inch of rain since Hermine arrived Monday, Lenore Correia, meteorologist at the National Weather Service bureau in Taunton, said Thursday. Nantucket hit the jackpot with about 1.25 inches.

In Boston, "We've gotten some rain for each of the past two days," she said. "But it's been scattered showers here and there."

Normally, tropical storms and hurricanes that head up the coast pass through our region within a day or two, if they make it to our area at all, and head out into the Atlantic.

But stubborn Hermine is unusual in how she stalled out.

A high pressure system over New England has helped block the storm from following a more typical route, according to Correia. As of late Thursday morning, the center of Hermine's remnants was positioned just south of the island of Nantucket, forecasters said.

But that's about to change.

"We're expecting it to move offshore completely tonight," said Correia. "The skies will start to fully clear by tomorrow — late morning probably."

Good riddance, Hermine, and thanks for nothing.

Doubt cast over Tiffany Moore verdict

The 911 call came in to Boston police at 9:22 p.m. “There’s a little girl shot on Humboldt Ave!” Screams and shrieks swirled in the background as the woman caller continued: “Oh God! Oh, the little girl on the ground, shot!” It was Aug. 19, 1988, a sultry night in the Grove Hall section of Roxbury. The girl on the ground was Darlene Tiffany Moore, a 12-year-old who moments before was perched on a mailbox, talking with friends. Blood poured from three bullet wounds. One - to the head - was the wound a medical examiner termed “incompatible with life.” MORE...
