More than 57,000 individuals and businesses have been added to the list of people whose unclaimed money is being held by the state government, state officials said Thursday, urging people to step up and claim it.

Those with unclaimed property due to them include the Boston Red Sox and the New England Patriots, the treasurer's office said.

A list of unclaimed property is released every six months, the office said. This list only includes individuals and businesses with unclaimed property over $100.

Unclaimed property includes savings and checking accounts, uncashed checks, insurance policy proceeds, stocks, and dividends that have been forgotten, the office said.

"Give us a call today," Treasurer Deborah Goldberg said in a statement. "We currently hold over $2 billion in unclaimed property at Treasury and it could be yours. One in 10 Massachusetts residents are owed money."

The Treasury said that last year, Massachusetts was the state to return the most money on a per

The full list of individuals and businesses who are owed money will be printed in the coming weeks in several local papers, including the Globe on Sept. 11. People can also go online to findmassmoney.com to learn if they are owed money.

The Treasury said there is no time limit for individuals or businesses to claim their property.

Thanks to stepped up efforts in recent years, Massachusetts has been able to get more unclaimed money back into the hands of its rightful owners.

The vast majority of people aren't going to get rich by claiming their money. About 98 percent of accounts are worth $1,000 or less.

And it's likely that a large portion of the $2 billion-plus worth of unclaimed property will never be claimed because officials have no idea who it actually belongs to.

Still there are some hefty sums to be had. The Globe reported in June that about two dozen people and businesses had $500,000 or more waiting for them, in many cases for years.
