It's not just city streets, vehicles are abandoned at Boston's Logan Airport as well.

Cars are abandoned alongside city streets in Boston, and some are also left behind at Logan

International Airport.

A vehicle left in a parking lot run by Massport, the state agency that runs the airport, would be flagged if it sits unmoved for 30 days, said Massport spokeswoman Jennifer Mehigan.

Officials would work to try to contact the vehicle's owner and also to check if the vehicle was a rental or had perhaps been reported stolen, she said.

If the vehicle still hadn't been moved after 10 weeks, it would be towed to an impound lot.

If the vehicle is held there for a year, it may be auctioned, Mehigan said.

Spike in abandoned car complaints is a mirage

Boston residents bombard City Hall with an increasing number of reports, but the actual number of abandoned vehicles on city streets has been flat, if not down, in recent years.

A third-party vendor runs the auctions and holds them typically once there are between 75 and 100 cars available for auction, she said.

The last time vehicles left at the airport were auctioned off was in October 2015. Prior to that, an auction hadn't been held since 2009, Mehigan said.

Below are some charts about the vehicles auctioned off in 2015 and the vehicles that have been abandoned since, that may eventually be put up for auction.
