A local philanthropist and developer wants to open a private social club called Haddon Hall in Back Bay that would feature gourmet dining, luxury overnight accommodations, and other amenities — including a gym and an outdoor terrace on the 11th floor.

If that plan comes to fruition, it would join dozens of other private social clubs already operating in Boston.

There are a variety of club types across the city, with different focuses and functions.

City records show there are 38 establishments with the most common type of club license, which allows them to serve all types of alcohol. Club licenses are distinct from alcohol licenses issued to bars and restaurants, for example, because they only allow the establishment to serve members and members' guests — not the general public.

Records show there are three other establishments in Boston with club licenses that only allow them to serve wine and malt beverages, such as beer.

A new take on old Back Bay private clubs in a bid to attract younger members

This would be markedly different than the Union, Somerset, Algonquin, and St. Botolph clubs. It'd be where Boston's old money types could mix with rising tech stars.

And, there are three more locations inside Logan International Airport with all-alcohol club licenses, and another 12 establishments scattered around the city that hold similar licenses unique to veterans clubs.
