In Allston-Brighton, Korean enclave grows strong roots

"I think now it's become a destination for anyone who is Korean-American, and for business owners wanting to open a Korean restaurant or market," said Heather Kim, who opened Douglas Paul Real Estate on Harvard Avenue a year ago.

Kim, who moved with her family from South Korea to the United States when she was 7 and who studied at Bentley University, said she chose the location in part because of the growing Korean community, which accounts for a majority of her clientele.

Across from Kim's offices, Myong Sool Chang moved his business, the Boston Korea weekly newspaper, from Newton to Allston six years ago so the publication would be closer to its readers and sources.

"The Korean people are very education-conscious. Even if they do not have money, they have to teach their children," he said. "Every generation, every group of students came to this area because New England has the best private schools, prep schools, and universities."

The 45-year-old Melrose resident grew up in Seoul before moving to the United States in 1998.

"It feels like a second home here," he said.

The change is most evident in Allston Village, which includes parts of Cambridge Street and Brighton, Harvard, and Commonwealth avenues. The section is home to a large number of ethnic groups, including Chinese, Russian, Brazilian, and Indian residents and business owners.

"Allston Village is really the most diverse destination for business in the city of Boston," said Alana Olsen, director of Allston Village Main Streets, a nonprofit organization that partners with the city to provide assistance to local businesses.

Of the 264 storefronts in the area, 1 in every 10 is Korean-owned, according to Olsen.

There are 10 Korean restaurants. When the Bethlehem To Go restaurant opened this summer, it pushed Korean dining establishments ahead of the commercial district's nine pizza shops.

The growing popularity of Korean food was apparent on a recent night at Myung Dong 1st Ave. restaurant and bar. As Korean pop videos lit up large TV screens and music played overhead, customers packed in.

Most were college students or young adults. Many were of Korean ancestry, but others were from other Asian backgrounds, white, or black.

Richard Kim, the 28-year-old son of Korean immigrants, is vice president for Metro Boston Group, a real estate development company his father founded in Allston.

"You used to only see Korean students in these restaurants," he said. "Now, it's a lot more different people who come in here."

He and friends shared dishes, including a braised pork foot and shank called jokbal, a fried octopus offering called nakji-somyun, and spicy fried chicken. They poured each other Soju, a rice wine, and a light Korean beer called Hite.

Andrew Hubbard, 28, said customs that go along with Korean dining can also appeal to people from other cultures.

"You push tables together. You share everything. You eat from the same bowls," he said while dining at Myung Dong. "It's not 'What are you ordering?' It's 'What are we ordering?'"

While places such as Brookline and Cambridge also have many Korean residents, Allston is becoming the Koreatown of Boston.

Andrew Lee, a 26-year-old Brighton resident and Suffolk University Law School student of Korean descent, said he recently visited the area around 32d Street in Manhattan, the heart of "K-Town" in New York City.

"There it's very established," he said. "Here it seemed to have just sort of sprouted up."

Joon Son, owner/operator of At The Buzzer, sells limited-edition athletic footwear on consignment.

Joon Son, a 29-year-old who moved from South Korea when he was an infant, agreed. The enclave in Allston "has been booming, and it's probably at its peak right now."

Son, Heather Kim's brother, owns At The Buzzer, a shop on Harvard Avenue that sells rare sneakers on consignment, along with hats and other apparel.

His business is one of several in Allston that is Korean-owned but does not focus on Korean products or concepts.

Jennifer Lee and her father co-own Myung Dong 1st Ave., along with one of Allston's longest-standing Korean restaurants, Buk Kyung II. In September 2011, the 27-year-old Lee opened Refuge Cafe, which serves American-style food.

"I think a lot of ethnic restaurants come to Allston because it's so diverse and welcoming, and all of the business owners look out for each other," she said.
